

SEEING WITH NEW EYES

Counseling and the Human Condition through the Lens of Scripture

DAVID
POWLISON

P U B L I S H I N G
P.O. BOX 817 • PHILLIPSBURG • NEW JERSEY 08865-0817

© 2003 by David Powlison

All rights reserved. No part of this book may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system, or transmitted in any form or by any means—electronic, mechanical, photocopy, recording, or otherwise—except for brief quotations for the purpose of review or comment, without the prior permission of the publisher, P&R Publishing Company, P.O. Box 817, Phillipsburg, New Jersey 08865-0817.

Scripture quotations are from the NEW AMERICAN STANDARD BIBLE®. ©Copyright The Lockman Foundation 1960, 1962, 1963, 1968, 1971, 1972 1973, 1975, 1977, 1995. Used by permission.

Italics within Scripture quotations indicate emphasis added.

Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Powlison, David, 1949–

Seeing with new eyes : counseling and the human condition through the lens of Scripture / David Powlison.

p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-87552-608-X (pbk.)

1. Pastoral counseling. 2. Bible—Psychology. I. Title.

BV4012.2.P59 2003

253.5—dc22

2003059577

---

C O N T E N T S

---

Preface	1
Introduction: The Gaze of God	9
Part 1 Scripture Opens Blind Eyes	15
1. Counsel Ephesians	17
2. Who Is God?	35
3. Godly Roles and Relationships: Ephesians 5:21–6:9	59
4. Peace, Be Still: Psalm 131	75
5. Why Me? Comfort from Psalm 10	91
6. Don't Worry: Luke 12:22–34	109
Part 2 Reinterpreting Life	125
7. X-ray Questions	129
8. I Am Motivated When I Feel Desire	145
9. God's Love: Better Than Unconditional	163
10. What If Your Father Didn't Love You?	171
11. Human Defensiveness: The Third Way	183
12. The Ambiguously Cured Soul	201
13. What Do You Feel?	211
14. Love Speaks Many Languages Fluently	225
15. Biological Psychiatry	239
Conclusion: Toward Simplicity	253
Notes	259
Index of Scripture	269

PREFACE

---

I pray that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give to you a spirit of wisdom and of revelation in the knowledge of Him.

I pray that the eyes of your heart may be enlightened, so that you will know what is the hope of His calling, what are the riches of the glory of His inheritance in the saints, and what is the surpassing greatness of His power toward us who believe. Ephesians 1:17–19

That’s an eye-opening request. “Unveil yourself, God of glory. Wake us up to know you, Savior-King. Enlighten the eyes of our hearts. Drive away the darkness that blinds, chokes, and shrinks us. Make us see.”

This is the first of three books I plan to write about “counseling.” But it’s counseling with an unusual twist. Intentionally helpful conversations—that’s all counseling is—look different when you look at them from the perspective of seeing God. You see people and their troubles in a different light. These books will talk about problems in living, about conversations that seek to be helpful, about how to think through the things people struggle with, about skillful pursuit of personal and interpersonal objectives. So these books will be about “counseling” kinds of things. But familiar objects will be cast in a very different light.

Have you ever had the experience of getting angry, upset, or worried about something—only later to discover some crucial fact you hadn’t known? Or have you ever been delighted with something or someone, and later found out you’d been had? Something you had not taken into account explained everything in a different way. You had no reason at all to be upset—or happy. When you began to see more fully, everything changed. These books are about taking into account something that changes everything. Let me tell a story to capture this.

One day I noticed a disheveled stranger pacing through our neighborhood. He was chain-smoking, jerking his head to the side, and shouting out into the air, “OK! OK! OK!” He had a wild, disturbed look. After about fifteen minutes of erratically walking up and down the sidewalk, he started to trespass through back yards, continuing to carry on. Convinced that a madman was on the loose, I called 911.

A few minutes later the squad car pulled up. By now the man was standing on the sidewalk right in front of our house, still agitated, still shouting out “OK! OK!” The policeman cranked down his window, leaned out, and asked, “Can I help you, buddy?” (I could hear the conversation through an open window.) The man leapt over to him and effused, “Oh, officer, I’m so glad you’re here. I’m visiting this neighborhood, and I’ve lost my little brown puppy. He’s named José. I’ve been looking all over, calling his name over and over again. He doesn’t know the area to find his way back to the house. Could you please keep your eyes out for him?”

The officer paused, and said, “Sure, buddy, I’ll look around.” He rolled up his window and started to drive off. I could see him slowly shaking his head, as if to say, “Oh brother, who’s the madman in this neighborhood?!”

I had important facts that concerned me: a disheveled stranger, agitated, chain-smoking, repeatedly shouting a word that rhymed with oh-ay, trespassing. But once I saw in a different light, everything changed. Should I have felt threatened—or felt compassion? Should I have called 911—or gone looking for a lost puppy? When you see differently, you interpret differently. You react differently, intend differently, act differently.

GOD IN THE PICTURE

It’s similar with those things, activities, persons, and processes that we identify with counseling. When you include God in the picture, it changes the way you think about “problem,” “diagnosis,” “strategy,” “solution,” “helpful,” “cure,” “change,” “insight,” and “counselor.”

When the lights go on, you see God and know that God sees you. Not one of these “counseling” words can stay the same. The world is still populated with the same problems begging for help (in fact, seeing God, you see more problems!), but it’s as different as José or OK, reality or fantasy.

My goal in these books is to help us see God in the counseling context. How can we see what he sees, hear what he says, and do what he does? As we grasp this, we will become more thoughtful in understanding people, and more skillful in curing souls. This involves developing the church’s model for systematically biblical counseling. A comprehensive model has four components. A conceptual framework defines norms, problems, and solutions. A methodology engages in skillful, intentional conversation to remedy defined ills. A social structure delivers cure and care to people in need of help. An apologetic subjects other systems to criticism and defends one’s model against competitors. Each of the various counseling models offers a version of these four components. Seen this way, all counseling models—whether secular or religious—are essentially differing systems of “pastoral care and cure.”

CONCEPTS

Concepts are the first and defining ingredient in any system of counseling. Every theory defines its version of human nature and the dynamics of human motivation. Every theory defines or assumes an ideal of human functioning by which problems are named and solutions prescribed: right and wrong, value and stigma, true and false, good and bad, sound and defective, healthy and pathological, solution and problem. The various personality theories and psychotherapies differ from each other—and from the Bible—in the ways they explain people and in the solutions they offer.

The Bible’s truth competes head-to-head with other models. God speaks a truth that is intended to make sense of us and change us. It is not truth about how to find a job, or how genes transmit eye color, or how to fix a clogged drain. The truth that is in Jesus reveals and changes what we live for. He changes how we live. The Bible’s “theory” for personal ministry mediates true Truth, claiming that other conceptual systems give expression to variants on “the lie.” Other systems of thought systematically suppress awareness of our dependency on and accountability to God.

The biblical model is more than one more “model,” conceptual system, or personality theory among many. Truth mediates a Person, a working Redeemer. To be human is to love a Savior, Father, Master, and Lord. Instead of “psychopathology” and “syndromes,” we see “sins” against this Person, and we see sufferings that are “trials” revealing our need for a true Deliverer and refuge. Instead of proposing that some psychodynamic insight, met need, altered self-talk, or behavioral rehabilitation will cure us, we receive God’s actual mercies as our salvation. Instead of defining change as an intra-psychic, psychosocial, or biological process of “healing” or “growth,” we define change as turning to a Person whom we trust, fear, obey, and seek to please. Instead of letting the goal of “health” cue our system to a medical metaphor, we set the goal of being transformed into the likeness of this Person with whom we live in relationship. The Bible’s conceptual framework surely addresses “psychological,” “behavioral,” “emotional,” and “interpersonal” phenomena. But Scripture is so radically about persons-vis-à-vis-a-Person that it utterly shatters and wholly reconfigures the culture’s stock categories for thinking about personhood. Our system is aligned interpersonally, morally, and covenantally. Relationship with God pervades every feature of psychological and social existence.

METHODS

A counseling model also involves methods designed to facilitate a change process; it is counseling, as well as counsel. Wisdom, in the biblical sense, is practical knowledge; it is truth practiced, spoken, walked out, and applied. Ephesians 4:15 crystallizes two central actions: truth-speaking and loving. Of course, every other counseling methodology contains some analogy to or counterfeit of these. But Paul infuses loving conversation with its true contents and intentions: God-centered, Christ-centered, redemptive, and pastoral.

The wider context in Ephesians teaches and illustrates other ingredients in a comprehensive methodology of face-to-face ministry:

radical dependency on God (1:16–19; 3:14–21); core attitudes of kindness toward others’ failings (4:2–3, 32); timeliness and appropriateness that arise from knowing people and their life-situations (4:29); appropriate self-disclosure (Ephesians 1 and 3); grasp of the change process as progressive, practical, and detailed, both inside and out (4:17–6:9); awareness of the other voices and instincts that tug at people (4:14, 17–22; 5:6); ability to communicate with constructive and compelling reasonableness (4:29; 6:19–20); and faithfulness to God’s revelation as the definitive word on what is true, good, and transformative (throughout Ephesians!). The entire letter models Paul’s approach to both public and private ministry. He knows who he is in Christ, and walks the same path to which he calls others. He loves those with whom he speaks. He knows them, what they face, and where they struggle. He addresses them candidly and constructively. He works them through what change looks like and does, right down to the everyday details. No counseling methods ever dreamed or practiced are superior to such a Live, Love, Know, Speak, and Do—the ingredients of pastoral methodology given us in shorthand for us to develop, make our own, and “improve.”

INSTITUTIONS

Third, every counseling model entails a “delivery system,” a social structure. Ideas and practices inhabit institutions. Concepts and methods comprise the knowledge and tools of professions and social systems. In modern America, the “mental health system” is a vast complex of higher education, hospitals, publishers, third-party insurers, drug companies, licensing boards, and private practice psychotherapists. But the loving truth and truthful love of Ephesians 4:15 come embedded in a different social system: the ekklēsia of the people of God.

The most magnificent institutional structure imaginable is a community living up to how Ephesians 4 weds pastoral leadership with every-member mutuality. Both the special gifts from God and the general call to all God’s people traffic in the cure of souls, as each part does its part. Christ’s change agenda, the transformation of fallen humanity, drives both public and personal ministry. Wisdom incarnates in both proclamatory and interactive communication. God's new society in Christ, come into its own and coming into its own, is the institution for counseling ministry.

The institutional structures within which wise counsel should flourish will take many forms, as biblical norms are applied and adapted. Local congregations will variously structure their care and counsel, based on God's allocation of gifts, the configuration of human needs and problems they face, contingencies of congregational and staff size, and demographics. The regional church will equip, organize, and oversee counsel and counseling, and will deliver experienced counsel as a backup to local churches. Para-church institutions will serve particular focused mission purposes: auxiliary preaching and counseling within prison ministries, crisis pregnancy centers, rescue missions, discipleship training programs, counseling ministries, chaplaincies, hospices, schools, church-planting mission agencies, and the like. Whether finding expression in local church, regional church, or para-church, God's new society is called to develop and provide radical alternatives to the current system of autonomous counseling professions licensed by the state, creedally committed to the secular psychologies, and funded on a for-profit, fee-for-service basis. God's wisdom has institutional implications.

APOLOGETICS

The fourth element in every counseling model is apologetics. A model gives a standpoint from which to interact with others. We make the case for what we believe is true and good. We subject competing models to systematic questioning. We defend our own model against critics. We develop our model under the stimulus of criticisms by others. We seek to win others. Each of the modern psychologies ministers its own distinctive "word"; each disciples its hearers into its particular ideal "image"; each criticizes other psychologies (and Christianity) for misconstruing the human condition. We also critique them from our standpoint.

Any psychology or psychotherapy that suppresses God cannot help but serve the varied desires and falsehoods congenial to the flesh. Most psychotherapies in their "high" form are morally austere, rather than nakedly self-indulgent. Classic psychotherapies—psychoanalytic, existential, cognitive, and moralistic—make strong demands on their subjects, appealing to the flesh’s more refined lusts: pride, self-righteousness, self-trust, the acquisition of inner-circle knowledge. Psychotherapies in their “low” or “pop” forms pander to coarser desires of flesh and ego: cravings for acceptance, love, self-esteem, significance, power, success. But whether highbrow or lowbrow, the secular psychologies construct diagnoses of the human condition that suppress awareness of sin, and they offer cures that evade the necessity of Jesus Christ’s redeeming work. Believers, practitioners, and clients of such systems can be won, even while we protect the faithful from their teachings.

This first book, Seeing with New Eyes, focuses on the conceptual. It unfolds Scripture’s view of people and problems. It reinterprets common counseling phenomena through God’s eyes, as revealed in Scripture. The second book will focus on the methodological and the institutional aspects of biblical counseling wisdom. And the third book will focus on the apologetic component, understanding our times and critiquing other models, while also attempting to further develop our own model as we listen to the critiques that others offer of us. My hope is that these books will do their part to assist the church in the care and cure of souls, and to encourage God’s people, individually and corporately, to lay hold of the promises and calling that are ours in Christ.

INTRODUCTION: THE GAZE OF GOD

---

I believe in Christianity as I believe that the sun has risen, not only because I see it, but because by it I see everything else.<sup>1</sup>

“By it I see everything else.” This risen and rising sun—Light of the world, no less!—opens our eyes to see. We come to “see” a man we’ve never actually laid eyes on. In fact, we not only see him, but we love him, trust him, and delight in him (1 Peter 1:8). Along the way he teaches us to see everything else the world contains. We aren’t talking about retinal images processed in the brain. This seeing, this gaze, means to wake us up from our fantasies, fictions, and nightmares to see things as they are in fact. God has the real take on things. And God teaches us his gaze.

We learn (slowly! in fits and starts!) to see how God sees. God, self, others, problems, circumstances, all now appear in the true mirror. Learning the gaze of God, we come to weigh life aright. We discern good and evil, fair and foul, lovely and degraded. Our Father enlightens the eyes of our hearts. We become able to pry apart true from false, instead of living in a murk of half-truths and flat lies.

All sorts of things start to look and to mean different when the lights come on: friendship, artistic abilities, Orion’s belt brilliant on a winter night, bone cancer, a frustrating job search, money in the bank, the waste of our wraths and sorrows, forgiveness sought and granted, old hurts and fresh affronts, kind hearts and opportunities not to be missed, anorexia-bulimia, quiet desperation and joy inexpressibly full of glory, Day-Timer or Palm Pilot, the sounds and smells of tonight’s dinner sizzling in the pan. The sins and sufferings of the human condition (the “stuff” of counseling) look different.

Consider this example. Both Caiaphas and Peter “saw” the same retinal images of Jesus. (To widen the metaphor, we might add that both “heard” the same tympanic vibrations when Jesus spoke.) But the priest saw a threat and heard a charlatan. The friend saw the maker, judge, and savior of the world, and he heard words of eternal life. When you wake up to see the sun, and hear the waterfall, and smell the coffee, and touch the garment’s hem, and taste that the Lord is good, it must change how you see everything.

To think Christianly is “to think God’s thoughts after him.” Of course, our thinking is both finite and distorted. We never see it all; and we often misconstrue what we do see. We see in a glass darkly, skewed reflections in a battered bronze mirror—but we do see. God, who sees all things directly in full daylight, enlightens the eyes of our hearts. We see surfaces, catching glimpses of interiors; God sees to the inky or radiant depth of every heart, all the way down to fundamental hate or fundamental love. Our glasses are sometimes rosy, sometimes jaundiced, sometimes bluesy, sometimes mirrored on the inside of the lens (so that all we can see are the turbulent contents of our own interiors). The madness in our hearts generates warped spectra. But God sees all things in bright, clear light—and this God is the straightener of crooked thoughts. He makes madmen sane.

Lest this sound overly cognitive, we also learn “to intend God’s intentions after him.” Christianity is both a way of seeing and a way of proceeding. Christ enters and engages the world he sees. He acts and reacts. The “mind of Christ” is no mental list of theoretical doctrines. His gaze brings with it ways of experiencing, patterns of appropriate reaction, and a game plan for engaging what he sees. So, we learn to pursue God’s pursuits after him, to act God’s acts, feel God’s feelings, love God’s loves, hate God’s hates, desire God’s desires. When the Word became flesh, Jesus lived all God’s communicable attributes on the human scale. No, we will never be all-knowing, or all-powerful, or all-present. But yes, we will be wise and loving, true and joyous. We will weep with those who weep. We will lay down our lives for our friends, bear sufferings, love enemies, and say with all our heart, “Thank you.”

A LOOK AT COUNSELING

Does God have a take on counseling? Does his gaze have anything to say about the myriad issues counseling deals with? Has he communicated the way he thinks? Of course, yes, amen. This book aspires to listen well, to look closely, to think hard (however haltingly) within the patterns of God's gaze.

Seeing with New Eyes presents a collection of essays written over a period of almost twenty years. Most of them originally appeared in the Journal of Biblical Counseling between 1985 and 2003.<sup>2</sup> They have been edited to eliminate redundancies or irrelevancies, and to enhance the coherence of the whole. These articles are of many sorts: Bible exposition, topical essay, editorial, sermon. You will find a number of interlocking themes appearing again and again. Everywhere evident is God's gracious self-revelation in Jesus Christ and Scripture. The real needs and problems of real people—our sins and miseries, our need for the Father of mercies—are always in view. Our current social and cultural context—the modern psychologies and psychotherapies, these alternative theologies and alternative cures of soul—are continually engaged.

One evening many years ago, my wife Nan and I got into one of those memorable "What is your life about, really?" conversations. We each asked, "What should the epitaph be on your gravestone?" I knew instantly.

I had been a most unlikely candidate for Christian faith. (I suppose that made me an ideal candidate!) I was taken with the typical passions of the '60s and '70s: existentialism, Hindu mysticism, psychodynamic psychologies, literature, aesthetic experiences, personal pleasures, radical politics, finding Truth by an inward-looking journey, calling the shots about the meaning of life, changing the world, hating hypocrisy. Of course, I hated Christianity. Becoming a believer was not at the bottom of the possible options list; it was at the top of the "No way!" list.

But God arrested me with the love of Christ. My epitaph was obvious: "The God who said, 'Let light shine out of darkness,' has shone into our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Christ" (1 Cor. 4:6). He turned on the Light of the world in a benighted heart.

This book is unabashedly personal. It is about things that delight me. It is divided into two sections. First comes Scripture: God's voice speaks into real life to reveal the gaze and intentions of the Christ who pursues us. We will seek to let the light of Christ shine. The first section seeks to embrace, probe, and unravel Scripture. Second comes understanding people amid their real life struggles: the pursuit of wise truth. We will seek to interpret (and reinterpret) real life through God's eyes. The second section seeks to embrace, probe, and unravel the problems of daily life.

The vision that animates this book is close kin to some words of Dietrich Bonhoeffer. By all accounts, he was a man of faith, integrity, and courage. Because of Christ, he stood up to the cant, rant, and cruelty of Hitler and the Nazis, and he died for it. While he lived, he closely observed and thoughtfully reflected on what makes for a true and deep understanding of people. It's easy to skim or skip through long quotations (I confess my own tendency), and this is a long quotation. But do pause, and read it carefully. See what Bonhoeffer has seen.

The most experienced psychologist or observer of human nature knows infinitely less of the human heart than the simplest Christian who lives beneath the Cross of Jesus. The greatest psychological insight, ability, and experience cannot grasp this one thing: what sin is. Worldly wisdom knows what distress and weakness and failure are, but it does not know the godlessness of man. And so it also does not know that man is destroyed only by his sin and can be healed only by forgiveness. Only the Christian knows this. In the presence of a psychiatrist I can only be a sick man; in the presence of a Christian brother I can dare to be a sinner. The psychiatrist must first search my heart and yet he never plumbs its ultimate depth. The Christian brother knows when I come to him: here is a sinner like myself, a godless man who wants to confess and yearns for God's forgiveness. The psychiatrist views me as if there were no God. The brother views me as I am before the judging and merciful God in the Cross of Jesus Christ.<sup>3</sup>

When our gaze awakens to the gaze of God, we have started to see. Seeing clearly, we can love well.

***

It is a pleasure to mention debts that express joys, not frets; obligations whose burden is gratitude, not disgruntlement! My difficulty comes in naming all those whom I owe in writing this book. Let me mention only those whose influence I feel most immediately and keenly.

Thank you, Augustine, Luther, Calvin, and Edwards, in whom I witnessed how truth catches fire into the real times, places, and persons that we call “history.” Thank you, Cornelius Van Til and John Frame, from whom I learned to look at life with God in view. Thank you, Jay Adams and Jack Miller, in whom I saw how Jesus Christ continually reaches and teaches people through the Word of life. It is a privilege to work within such a tradition of practical theological reflection and action. It is no accident that I acknowledge my debt to pastor-apologist-theologians who make it their life’s work to bring the Word to life. Simple faith goes to work through love, creatively redeeming the ever-mutating complexities of the human plight.

Thank you, colleagues at CCEF. Thank you, also, to the many men and women whom I’ve been privileged to know in various teaching, counseling, and preaching contexts. Every chapter bears the imprint of particular persons and interactions. This book is so deeply rooted in how you live, think, feel, question, act, struggle, change, and serve that I have a hard time knowing who might be responsible for what. The things I’ve sought to communicate are the product of a community at work.

Thank you, Jayne Clark, Sue Lutz, and Stephen Lutz for your work in conceptualizing this book and bringing it to completion.

Thank you, Nan, Peter, Gwenyth, and Hannah for your particular love to me, and the ways that every chapter bears the imprint of our lives together.

One final acknowledgment: I’ve always found a particular pleasure in singing those hymns of adoration and trust whose authorship God only knows. We don’t know the writers’ names for “Fairest Lord Jesus,” “How firm a foundation,” “All hail the power of Jesus’ name,” “O, come, all ye faithful,” and “When morning gilds the skies.” In an age of copyright, self-promotion, and property claims, it’s refreshing when no person can get any obvious credit for honoring God. Anonymity provides an object lesson that reaches even to where acknowledgments can be made. We must acknowledge our debt to God alone for what proves enduring in truth, goodness, and beauty. I sincerely hope that strands in this book will prove worthy of contributing to the mind, heart, hands, and voice of the church of Christ. I am sure that certain strands will be found wanting, forgettable, or dubious. But I know with certainty that in whatever proves worthy, credit is due to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in whom we exult with an unknown worshiper: "Glory and honor, praise, adoration, now and forevermore be Thine."

PART I SCRIPTURE OPENS BLIND EYES

---

I suppose all of us who read Scripture find ourselves particularly gripped by certain parts. Three books most deeply delight me: Ephesians, Psalms, and Luke. Ephesians dwells in a high and holy place, and also with the humble and contrite in heart. Appearing on the same page, even in the same sentence, are God's highest glories and the gritty practicalities of how we are to live. The Psalms capture faith on the wing: alive, human, both blunt and thoughtful, whether needy or glad, caught in the act of communicating with God. Luke portrays the tenderly powerful Jesus, friend of the needy, upsetter of powers-that-be. The articles in this section sample these books.

We engage Ephesians at three different levels. Chapter 1, "Counsel Ephesians," stands back and asks, "How do we begin to understand this astonishing letter?" It's about the dynamic nature of Scripture. In technical terms, it's about hermeneutics, how we fairly interpret what God has given us.

Chapter 2 plunges into Ephesians, looking for the answer to one big question: "Who Is God?" In technical terms, it does systematic theology, taking one topic at a time and asking questions.

Chapter 3 unpacks in detail the passage on marriage, family, and work relationships. In technical terms, "Godly Roles and Relationships: Ephesians 5:21–6:9" does exegesis and ethics. It considers specific text in specific context. And because that text is about practical attitudes and behaviors, the chapter organizes and applies the ethical instructions.

Two chapters on the Psalms grapple with two aspects of evil that dog us throughout our lives: sin and suffering. Chapter 4, "Peace, Be Still: Psalm 131” unfolds Psalm 131. This brief, quiet psalm takes dead aim at the restless pride of our grasping hearts, and works to calm us.

Chapter 5 brings Psalm 10 to people who have been used, misused, and abused by others. “Why Me?” captures the anguish of the needy and victimized, as well as the clear thinking and intelligent faith that sufferers need to face up to evils.

Finally, Chapter 6, “Don’t Worry,” is a sermon on a sermon that Jesus preached (Luke 12:22–34). Jesus pours on reasons not to worry—in the very areas we all too easily fret. Why a sermon in a book on counseling? Public ministry (the scripted, planned talk) inhabits the same truths as interpersonal ministry (improvised conversations).

I

COUNSEL EPHESIANS

---

Newcomers to biblical counseling often experience a sharp-edged uncertainty reflected in questions like the following: “Where should I begin? I am keenly aware of my inability and incompetence, but I want to help people. I want to reflect and communicate Jesus Christ! But I know the Bible is vast and deep. The particulars of God’s working can be unclear. At the same time, the problems and burdens people bring are perplexing and overwhelming. And I have my own sins and struggles. My understanding and ability are limited and compromised. I’ll never begin to help other people grow in wisdom if I need to master the entire Bible and solve every variant of the human condition, including my own! Where do I start?” Experienced counselors—unless they’ve become dry and rote—also feel the sharp edge of similar questions, not about how to begin, but about how to continue on. When you step into the light of God and into the darkness of mankind, you step into unfathomables. Who is sufficient for such things? How will you master what exceeds your comprehension and ability?

You will not go wrong if you plunge into Paul’s letter to the Ephesians. Master it. Be mastered by it. Work Ephesians into your thinking, your living, your prayers, and your conversation. The Bible is vast and deep, and human life is diverse and perplexing. But in a pinch you could do all counseling from Ephesians. It’s all there: the big picture that organizes a myriad details. And Ephesians is not only “counsel,” but also “counseling.” It talks and walks method as well as content. Paul himself is a changed man. He lives out and teaches wise pastoral strategy. Ephesians aims to teach you how to live. That is a synonym for counseling biblically, for doing face-to-face ministry.

This essay is not a “commentary” on Ephesians. It attempts a different genre, being written for people involved in the face-to-face aspects of ministry, as shepherds of individual souls. Ephesians itself was written by a shepherd of souls. Yes, Paul was an exegete and a theologian, but he was first a man in Christ, and then always a pastor, to all of God’s people (in other words, a preacher) and to each one of God’s people (in other words, a counselor). Someone once described Jonathan Edwards this way: “His theology was all application, and his application was all theology.” That’s the sort of theology and application that Ephesians incarnates. It’s also what is attempted here: to write practical theology from Ephesians.

Let me begin by addressing a crucial preliminary question. How do we interpret Ephesians? What is it we are dealing with? I have neither space nor wisdom to give a comprehensive hermeneutic philosophy and exegetical methodology as these bear on counseling. But let me make three points to orient us as we seek to think accurately about this book.

EPHESIANS IS PRACTICAL THEOLOGY

Ephesians is not just about practical theology, it is practical theology. The distinction between “biblical truth” and “practical application” is artificial. In the Bible, truth arrives in action. Paul teaches by applying biblical truth to himself and others. Ephesians is not a treatise, manual, or commentary. It is a letter. Ephesians is application, life lived out before our eyes. The very truth of God comes via the author’s life in Christ, and via the contents of his letter. This truth embodies the faith and faithfulness that are its intended results in readers. “Practical theology” and “pastoral practice” speak and act personally: a message, from me, to you.

Ephesians is a letter. It is not about various theological or ethical “topics.” It is not a collection of aphorisms or a treatise about God and human beings in general. It is not a story. Paul writes in the first and second person. You hear him talking with you as if he were saying: “God predestined us to adoption. I give thanks for you. You were dead in sins. We have received an inheritance. Pray for me.” Ephesians expresses a three-sided encounter between God, Paul, and his hearers.

Practical theology takes place in the first and second persons: you, I, we. It only talks “about” something or someone when that best serves talking “to” someone. In Ephesians, ministry, life, and relationships are happening, so Paul’s words come packaged as prayer, worship, self-disclosure, and direct address.

Let that grab you: Paul’s words come as prayer, worship, self-disclosure, and direct address. This is very different from most books. It is different—sadly—from most sermons, teachings, and counseling sessions. It is different from the distance and presumed objectivity of most scholarly theological reflection, or the clinical mode of most counseling writing. When Paul discusses the glory of God’s grace in Christ, he audibly exults in that grace (Eph. 1:1–14). When he teaches about the power of God in Christ and your deepest need, he lets you hear how he prays for you (1:15–23). When he gives his doctrines of sin and salvation, he directly addresses you: “You were dead. We were dead. By grace you have been saved. We are his workmanship” (see Eph. 2:1–22). When Paul expounds theology about how all nations are welcome in Christ, he tells his own story and breaks forth into another prayer: “Hear about the stewardship of God’s grace which was given to me for you . . . I bow my knees before the Father that he would grant you . . .” (see Eph. 3:1–21). When Paul goes on to write extensively about ethics, relationships, and the dynamics of change, he speaks directly to you: “I beseech you to walk worthy of your calling . . .” (4:1–6:18). When he signs off, it is with a prayer request, some personal information, and a warm goodbye (6:19–24). Ephesians is practical, relational, and pastoral. Living faith itself happens in the first and second persons. Since faith in Christ is caught as well as taught, Paul pulls out the personal stops to make what he says infectious. Ephesians is practical theology. It is living faith. It is ministry in action. All this is tremendously significant for how you understand and use Ephesians today.

By definition, most thoughtful writing about Ephesians has been scholarly. As such, it runs the danger of misrepresenting Ephesians by failing to come back full circle to practical life and ministry. Good scholarship can serve ministry well, if we recognize what the Bible is, and what it intends to accomplish. Failure to recognize this sends scholarship over the cliff into either error or irrelevancy, and renders ministry misguided and impotent. Ephesians, like life and ministry, does not operate in the genres of most theological education. It is practical theology and pastoral practice, and aims to produce the same. It is neither exegesis, nor systematic theology, nor redemptive story.

Ephesians Is Not Exegetical Theology

It is not in the form of a Bible study or commentary. Though Paul quotes, paraphrases, or alludes to many Old Testament passages (and New Testament realities), he steers his background study and understanding toward a different present purpose. The Ten Commandments, Psalms, Isaiah, and Proverbs appear, but they appear in action, in the here and now, spoken and applied in new ways. His message is always old, arising from Bible study, and coherent with other Scripture. But his message is always new, reworked for ministry now. He uses older Scripture. He does not just “exposit,” because he is not governed by exegetical interests. He constructs a message, governed by ministry-to-real-people interests. Likewise, our job is only begun, not done, when we have studied Ephesians in itself. We, too, must be governed by fresh ministry-to-real-people interests, or we will never really understand Ephesians or be able to use it for the well-being of others.

Exegesis probes the original audience, author, and message. We must exegete, but we must do more than exegete. We must move beyond the original.

Ephesians Is Not Systematic Theology

Yes, it is a primary source of answers to questions central to the system of biblical truth. For example, there is no clearer teaching anywhere about God’s high sovereignty: his purpose, power, grace, and glory in Christ are so exalted that he who has ears to hear what the Spirit writes to the churches must become a heart-afire Calvinist. Here, too, you find unique insight into union with Jesus Christ, the nature of the church, the process of sanctification, our social relations, and spiritual warfare. But Paul’s explicit purposes are not systematic. Rather, he is pastoral and personal. His teaching that we are in Christ comes in the course of worshiping, praying, and exhorting. Why? You also must worship, pray, exhort—and listen to Paul—so that you and others would know this Christ dwelling in your hearts through faith, and would know the love of this Christ that surpasses knowledge. Systematic theology organizes the whole of the Bible with a philosophical logic, but we must do more than catechize people with our doctrinal categories if we are to minister to them.

Ephesians Is Not Biblical Theology

It is not a recitation of the story of God's redeeming work throughout history. Yes, the Story is all here: God's eternal purposes to be carried out in Christ; predestining love; creation by the Maker of all things; the fall into all-absorbing sin and just wrath; deliverance through the Beloved's blood; the raising up of Christ and of us in Christ; his coronation upon the throne of all power; the present indwelling of the Holy Spirit in both church and heart; the expansion of the promise to include all peoples in promises originally for Jews only; the anticipated day of his return when the kingdom will be revealed in all its glory, perfection, and wrath. But the Story is scattered through Ephesians in snippets. While the pieces are capable of reassembly into a redemptive historical narrative, Paul is up to other purposes. Yes, every story is embedded in this Story. Everyone lives tucked between eternal purpose and eternal destiny, a story within the Story. But, note well, Paul did not write a narrative. He did not write a piece of biblical theology. He does not content himself with storytelling when he intercedes for you, pleads with you, sings high praises, promises, and commands. Biblical theology organizes the whole of the Bible with a historical and narrative logic, but we must do more than tell the Story if we are to minister to people.

Ephesians is fair game for the labors of exegetical, systematic, and biblical theology.<sup>1</sup> These auxiliary disciplines are crucial for understanding the Bible in and of itself. But never forget, Ephesians is and does practical theology, speaking from the Lord into people's lives. We only reach Paul's intended goal when we also do practical theology, speaking the truth in love to grow up together into Christ, our head. You must close the loop. Paul's walk and fresh message must lead to your own walk and fresh message. We must apply its present message to its present audience to truly understand it. Practical theology is the end in view. Ephesians sings and dances; it is not just a book containing lyrics, score, and choreographic diagrams. It is written to change you and make you an instrument of change in the lives of your brothers and sisters. Yes, bring the tools of Bible study and theological reflection to bear. But never allow the support disciplines to degenerate into ends in themselves. Explore the practical wisdom that is Ephesians's chief end, so that you, too, will live and do ministry the way Paul does.

EPHESIANS IS A DOOR TO THE REST OF SCRIPTURE

A second key for understanding and using Ephesians well is to see the “hot links” to the rest of Scripture and to see the particular way Paul uses other Scripture. Ephesians communicates a sense of the entirety of Scripture. It is dense with specific citations and allusions and uses other Scripture for present purposes. Scripture bleeds Scripture, and God's new message is constructed out of God's former messages. The new message is consistent in general to older messages, but it innovates in the specifics.

What is the hermeneutic principle by which Paul appropriates the rest of Scripture? Paul's method is quite striking, perhaps even disturbing to common views of Bible study. To be sure, Paul is not fanciful or arbitrary. He does not play fast and loose with Scripture, as if anything goes. He does not bend Scripture to his own fancy by proof-texting, by spinning fantastic allegories, by numerology, by word association, or by arbitrary spiritualizing of texts. He never does out-of-control things like taking Numbers 13:33 to mean “the spies in the land suffered low self-esteem because they saw themselves like grasshoppers.” His logic is not the sort that says, “Nehemiah first inspected the damage to the walls of Jerusalem, therefore counselors must first explore the woundedness of those they counsel.” But it is also noteworthy that Paul does not use the rest of Scripture in a grammatico-historical way either. In fact, he never exegetes and expounds the original meaning of the many passages he cites or alludes to. He comes close to proof-texting when he takes an old text in a different direction from its original: e.g., his use of “be angry but do not sin” (Ps. 4:4; Eph. 4:26). He comes close to allegory and spiritualizing when he extends and reconfigures the meaning and application of old texts: e.g., the victorious Lord's “ascending on high” (Ps. 68:18; Eph. 4:8–11) and a husband's “leaving and cleaving” (Gen. 2:24; Eph. 5:31f). In every case, Old Testament words and themes become bigger than they once were, showing spectacular new dimensions of meaning. Paul is extremely creative! Grammatico-historical interpretation of the originals does not lead to what Paul says and does.

We must ponder this carefully. What principles control Paul's use of older Scripture? A full answer lies well beyond the scope of this chapter, but the kernel of the answer can be stated in two principles. First, Jesus Christ super-fulfills the Old Testament. Second, there is a general thematic coherence rather than either contradiction or exact replication between new use and original meaning. Paul is creative, but not fantastic, contradictory, or disconnected. Christ creates both the difference and the coherence; the new purposes of ministry express both the difference and the coherence. Imagine that in 1905 God had promised your great-grandparents that someday he would give their descendants a Model T Ford, a radio communications system using Morse code, and a biplane. When he decided to deliver in 2003, he gave you a Dodge Viper, a satellite-linked cell phone, and an F-117A Stealth Fighter. The promise was fulfilled . . . in ways beyond imagination. You travel, do business, and fight in ways that show a thematic coherence with 1905—it is still recognizable as transportation, communication, and war—but the details have changed. Similarly, the prophecies, songs, commandments, and stories of the Old Testament become supercharged with the power and glory of the Holy Spirit by whom Jesus Christ indwells his people. They are tailored to the needs of a different people living in a different time, facing recognizable but different problems.

In opening doors to the entirety of Scripture, Ephesians “alters” previous Scripture. When Christ becomes the sacrificial offering (Eph. 5:2) and we become God's temple (2:21), we are invited to read Leviticus and 1 Kings differently—not with fanciful allegories, but as metaphors in blood and stone of a Christological dimension. When anger threatens the unity of Christ's people in the midst of their sanctification process (4:26), we are invited to read Psalm 4 differently, with entirely new implications. There are far-reaching differences between Paul's citations and the cited originals. It is as though the original were a solitary star seen by the naked eye. But seeing both Christ and contemporary need, Paul gazes at that star through a powerful telescope, and now he beholds the Andromeda Galaxy: billions upon billions of stars, a disk of radiant beauty 100,000 light years across, a vast spectacle of glory previously unimagined. The scope of application and the depth of implication multiply as Paul rereads the Old Testament and Gospels through the glory of the reigning Christ, and through his task of writing a practical charter for the church. Ephesians opens doors into other parts of the Bible, but it reworks the things it opens before us. Consider a half-dozen examples.

1. When Paul says, “Be filled with the Spirit, speaking to one another with psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs, singing and making melody with your heart to the Lord, always giving thanks for all things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ to God the Father” (Eph. 5:18–20), he opens a direct link to all 150 psalms. But Paul’s words also make all 150 psalms mean something more than they first meant. In the first place, David’s meditations, cries, shouts, and songs are recharged in the light of the Lord Jesus Christ and God the Father. In the second place, the psalms are here presented not as merely objects of Bible memory or liturgical recitation. Rather, “psalms” provide a paradigm for a living, speaking faith in Christ.

To be “filled with the Spirit” is to have your language alive to God, both your daily conversations with others and the inward conversation within your heart. Your cognitive stream-of-consciousness and your social interactions are meant to be psalm-like and psalm-informed. That includes the ability to quote a psalm in a timely and relevant way, but it is something much more. Paul calls you to a lifestyle of joyous dependence on Christ, to live in faith like the Psalms.

A videotape of your outward speech and inward thoughts would look like a continuously updated and personalized psalm. The realities of a living relationship with Christ infuse the way you process the specifics of your daily life. You speak and think new-minted re-creations and applications of Scripture into the exigencies of the moment, updated at every point by Jesus Christ. Examples of the Spirit filling people for psalm-like and psalm-informed words appear in Elizabeth, Mary, and Zechariah (Luke 1); in the teachings and prayers of Jesus (Luke 6; 11); in the speeches of Peter (Acts 2; 4); in the praying of believers (Acts 4); in the praises, prayers, and exhortations of Paul's entire letter to the Ephesians; in the times you speak the Word of God with boldness, clarity, and faith; in the times you bless the Lord with all that is within you. Paul has pointed you to Psalms with a radical new application: go and live like the psalms do, seeing the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. Not only does Paul point to the Psalter as a whole, but he specifically quotes three psalms. Each case gives the Old Testament a fresh application and a Christ-enriched focus. When God "puts all things in subjection under his feet" (Ps. 8:6; Eph. 1:22), a passage originally about the creation glory of mankind comes to picture the redemption glory of the unique Son of Man, in whom we also are raised and enthroned as the new humanity. Psalm 8 is recognizable, and not contradicted. But radio-transmitted Morse code has become a satellite-linked cell phone.

In Ephesians 4:8–11 Paul amplifies, and even alters Psalm 68:18: "When he ascended on high, he led captive a host of captives, and he gave gifts to men." The original proclaimed the Lord's victorious ascendancy at Mount Sinai, in an undefined future when all nations would bow. That future has now been defined, in Christ, and everything changes. A psalm about "ascending" is now taken to be pregnant with the prior "descending" of the Lord (incarnation, suffering, death). The place ascended is not Sinai, but the throne of the universe. The victory parade is reworked to tell of the Lord's "giving" gifted people to lead his church, actually inverting the original that had the Lord "receiving" gifts in homage.

When Paul writes, "Be angry, and yet do not sin" (Ps. 4:4; Eph. 4:26), he again shifts the direction of application in addressing a very different context. The original appeared as part of an extended meditation on stilling your heart into peace and trust, so that you would not sin when you are upset at the wrongdoing of God's enemies. The fresh restatement develops the necessity of dealing quickly with anger, primarily in the context of the remnant sins that can irritate and provoke those in Christ. It develops the devilish dimension, how unresolved anger plays into the divisive agenda of the accuser of the brethren. It sets our dealing with anger in the larger context of “learning Christ” (Eph. 4:20), one piece of the transformation of our lives. Psalm 4:4 has been adapted to a larger vision. The quotation sparkles with new meanings, not contradictions.

3. Ephesians opens a door into Proverbs. When Paul discusses walking in wisdom instead of folly (Eph. 5:15–18a), he creates a live connection to the whole book of Proverbs (and the wider wisdom tradition) that details this theme. He caps things off with a direct quote from the Greek translation of Proverbs 23:31, itself a loose paraphrase and amplification of the original Hebrew. This quotation does not function as an exegesis of Solomon’s vivid discussion of drunkenness in Proverbs 23. It serves as a “for instance” of foolish pleasure that contrasts with the solid pleasures of being filled with the Holy Spirit and knowing the Lord. Several clauses later, the “fear of Christ” (5:21) makes a Christ-enriched allusion to the first principle of all the wisdom literature, the fear of the Lord.
4. Paul’s radical Christifying of the Old Testament gets pushed to the extreme when he cites the call to “leave and cleave” (Gen. 2:24; Eph. 5:31–33). The principles of marriage—and Paul is still teaching on marriage—get pressed to serve radical Christ-and-church conclusions. Actual marriage becomes a secondary application of a text explicitly about marriage! The love of Christ for his wife and the submission of the church to her husband are a wellspring of truth about marriage. Genesis 2:24 remains thoroughly true in itself, but relatively narrow in meaning compared to what Paul now sees: the Andromeda Galaxy. Such a metaphorical use—we could call it “allegorizing” if that word retained any positive connotations—is not arbitrary, however. It is thematically consistent with the exegesis of Genesis 2.
5. Even the Ten Commandments are reworked and enriched in Christ and by present purposes. For example, Paul directly cites the fifth commandment (Ex. 20:12; Eph. 6:2–3), calling children to be subject to parents. Here he comes closest to replicating the original text, but, still, in at least three ways this fresh application is more than simple citation. First, he does not lead with the Scripture citation, but with his own Christ-loaded words—“Children, obey your parents in the Lord.” The Bible passage is then brought forward as a supporting text, not the primary point. Second, he editorializes in the middle of the quotation, inserting his comment about “the first commandment with a promise,” before finishing off the quote. Third, though the words are identical, “live long on the earth” in Ephesians means something decidedly different than “live long in the land” in Exodus. Israel has become all nations; the Lord has been revealed as Jesus Christ; the promise of real estate has been swallowed up in the promise of Christ.<sup>2</sup>

6. The source of one quotation in Ephesians remains a mystery: “For this reason it says, ‘Awake, sleeper, and arise from the dead, and Christ will shine on you’ ” (5:14). Previously, when Paul wrote, “Therefore, it says . . .” (4:8), he meant, “The Bible says,” and anyone could go look up Psalm 68:18. But here we do not know the “it” that says what follows. It is not the Bible, at least not directly. The best guess is that Paul cited the words of a well-known, first-century Christian hymn, rather as if he had quoted from “Amazing Grace” or “When Peace, Like a River.”

That analogy serves us well. Such hymns speak truth that is quotable in ministry: new, Christified psalms. Just as John Newton and Horatio Spafford had meditated on the Word of God, and that Word mapped onto their personal stories (a fact that both hymns vividly reflect), so Ephesians 5:14 was biblical even before it became Bible.

One can easily imagine a brother or sister who had received a wake-up call from God out of the dark torpors of sinfulness, and who now lived with a keen, urgent sense of the light of Christ. The language arises very naturally out of a conflation of Isaiah 26:19, 51:17, 52:1, and 60:1, but Isaiah’s language has been Christified and personalized to a somewhat different purpose. Isaiah never quite said what some first-century believer said in applying Isaiah’s words, which Paul then quoted for all time. So a contemporary paraphrase and adaptation of the Old Testament, reworked in the light of Christ, became part of the Scriptures with which we now work and live.

Does Paul's way of using Scripture make you nervous? It will, if you expect him to be doing exegetical theology, not practical theology. Should his way of using Scripture unsettle us, who stake our faith and practice on the authority, sufficiency, and clarity of God's self-revelation? Not at all. Paul's use of other Scripture does not contradict the original sense—biplane and Stealth Fighter remain analogous—though he never seeks to replicate the original sense. Exegetical theology has been respected, though pastoral usage flexibly adapts in order to make new points for new listeners in a new time.

Paul's modus operandi is actually quite familiar to biblical theologians and systematic theologians. They seek to answer our questions, just like practical theology does. Good biblical theology is comfortable with looking backwards at earlier things and seeing richer meanings: types, foreshadowings, prophetic words, pregnant events that only in retrospect reveal super-fulfillment as Christ enriches and alters previous revelation. Similarly, Paul's teachings are consistent with how good systematic theology proceeds to use the Bible. It uses the Bible to answer new questions of doctrine and ethics. And systematics often takes biblical words and defines them with either a broader or a narrower semantic field than they have in the Bible itself. Done faithfully, this does not pervert Scripture or exegesis, but it answers questions that need answering in a true and biblical manner.

Scripture itself uses language this same, normal, flexible way: "faith" has a different scope in Hebrews than in Romans; "justification" has a different slant in James than in Galatians. Paul's pastoral practice—like biblical theology, systematic theology, and wise living—manages to remain coherent with the content of specific texts, and yet it adapts texts to new purposes. Paul addresses new questions, and crafts a fresh message to contemporary hearers in a way that looks surprisingly freewheeling at first glance. What a remarkable, provocative, and unusual door Ephesians opens into the rest of the Bible! The light of the Lord Jesus Christ and current ministry needs lead Paul to rework Scripture and put Scripture to work.

What does all this mean? We see Paul opening doors into the rest of the Bible, yet we see him doing something quite different and more complicated than just quoting or exegeting Bible texts. He is a man transformed in Christ. He is doing ministry. He is living psalmically and proverbially. His faith speaks afresh to God and man in the exigencies of his particular life situation as apostle to the nations; he lives new-minted wisdom in that situation.

Here is the million dollar question: May we do something like what Paul did, even with Ephesians? Or was he exercising an apostolic prerogative when he Christified, paraphrased, recontextualized, and reworked Scripture? I will clarify what I mean and do not mean in the next paragraphs, but let me first state the answer bluntly. Not only may you do something like what Paul does, you must do so—and you already do so, every day.

Life and ministry that are faithful to God's Word and relevant to the varied conditions of humankind use Scripture in creative and personalizing ways. Honest, relevant, extemporaneous prayers pull together snippets and paraphrases of Scripture, interweaving the Bible with the current needs of people. Sermons quote and exegete Scripture, but they also cite Scripture out of context, play with language in fresh ways, tell new stories, and apply in creative ways. Heart to heart conversations quote or allude to passages and phrases from the Bible, all of it colored, reworked and personalized by the details of our lives. Good hymns work off of one particular passage or a collage of passages, elaborating them, pouring in Christ, weaving in human experience, developing analogous metaphors: "Christ the Lord is Risen Today," "How Firm a Foundation," "Amazing Grace," "What a Friend We have in Jesus."

Make no mistake, you are not writing or receiving the inscripturated Word of God. Your praying, preaching, counseling, singing, and living the Word embody a derivative authority only. You are not a mouthpiece of Scriptural revelation any more than John Newton or Horatio Spafford was. But if you live your life and do your job faithfully, you are praying the Word, preaching the Word, counseling the Word, singing the Word, and living the Word. In a way analogous to Paul, though not identical in authority, you will use Scripture with that multitude of adaptations, personalizations, paraphrases, and story-tellings that are part of the normal Christian life. We must do something like what Paul did, as well as stay faithful and subordinate to what Paul said. Faithful does not mean rote. Faithful does not mean you keep your nose in a book, even The Book, because The Book models something different.

I am not arguing for relativism. I am not arguing that revelation is ongoing and progressive. I am not arguing that parts of the Bible are passé and discardable. I am not arguing for “every man does what is right in his own eyes” when it comes to Bible interpretation. I am not arguing for departing from or modifying Scripture. I am not arguing that all meaning is in the eye of the beholder, as in postmodern, deconstructionist interpretation. I am not arguing for adding to the Bible, supplanting the Bible, or going beyond the Bible. I am not arguing for subjectivism. The Bible is absolute, eternal, infallible, authoritative, sufficient, perspicuous, unchanging, reliable truth, the Word of the living God. But I am arguing that good living, preaching, praying, counseling, conversing, teaching, meditating, and singing all do something with Scripture. Only in this way are we truly faithful to Scripture. “Wisdom” and “living faith” necessarily embody creative adaptations, applications, and personalizations.

The Bible models how truth is used, and such usage involves a flexibility and adaptability that may seem shocking, dangerous, and unfamiliar. But the alternatives to such an insightful and creative pastoral practice would have seemed shocking, dangerous, and unfamiliar to the apostle Paul. He was not wooden, “biblicistic,” or superstitious about Scripture. I will say again, you must do something like what Paul did in the way he used Scripture. You already do something like it every time you pray, ponder, preach, or counsel wisely. Becoming more conscious of what you do and should do will help you live and minister better.

EPHESIANS IS HARD TO UNDERSTAND SOMETIMES

Peter once commented that the letters of “our beloved brother Paul” contain “some things hard to understand, which the untaught and unstable distort, as they also do the rest of the Scriptures, to their own destruction” (2 Peter 3:15–16). If even a fellow apostle could find Paul hard to grasp, how much more will we find ourselves perplexed on occasion! Did Peter have Ephesians specifically in mind when he said Paul could be perplexing? We don’t know, but the shoe fits. And our ignorance and instability can lead us to distort the obvious as well as the difficult. We may not be those who utterly twist Paul's words to our destruction. But beware, the defining characteristics of evildoers are always the remnant tendencies and temptations of those who believe.

In our ignorance, we tend to blunder into foolish interpretations. In our instability, we tend to get sidetracked. The net effect is always a headstrong, desire-driven life that evades the central thrust of God's message. Instead, let us be thoroughly and consistently taught to know the Lord, to build stable lives of growing faith and growing love. We do well to ask God, "Give us more wisdom. Enable us to listen well." Our ability to understand is greatly affected by the clarity or confusion of our faith and by the obedience or disobedience of our practice. Here are three ways Ephesians can be hard to understand.

Incomprehensible without the Spirit

First, Paul himself acknowledges that Ephesians discusses matters that are incomprehensible unless the Holy Spirit opens our minds and hearts. God must give us a "spirit of wisdom and of revelation . . . that the eyes of our heart may be enlightened" to understand the very things printed on the page in front of us! God must enable us to "know the love of Christ that surpasses knowledge," or we remain in a stupor. This difficulty does not arise because Ephesians is particularly obscure. It is not full of dark sayings, odd imagery, and allusions to long-lost cultures. The book of Judges has places that are obscure to us, but Ephesians tends to be beyond us. Its meaning eludes us for reasons akin to what the old hymn says, "Immortal, invisible, God only wise, in light inaccessible, hid from our eyes . . . O help us to see 'tis only the splendor of light hideth Thee." Ephesians expresses the divine glory. We get bedazzled and blinded by the available light. The easily understandable things in Ephesians are islands of light in a sea of light brighter than the sun, not islands of light in a sea of darkness. By definition, we need God's help to understand Ephesians.

Divisive Debate vs. Unity

Second, a great deal of theological debate and ecclesiastical-interpersonal conflict has swirled around Ephesians, the book of unity. Such debate can have two immediate negative effects. Sometimes our attitudes become discolored by controversy itself. Sometimes our opinions are marked by particular errors. In either case (and often both happen together), we will have a hard time hearing what Ephesians really says. Controversy, even for good causes, tends to create tunnel vision and to breed ungodly attitudes. We make one mountain into the whole mountain range, or one molehill into a mountain. What we see, or think we see, consumes our minds. We lose sight of the mountain range, the context in which both mountain and molehill can be seen and weighed for what they are. We may be exactly right about our particular issue, but narrowed truth becomes unbalanced truth. It loses the ability to listen and be corrected. Narrowed truth becomes half-truth, and broadly false. Narrowed truth loses love and the redemptive modus operandi. As it does so, it becomes reactive error. It becomes increasingly distorted. It becomes a vehicle for interpersonal conflict and self-righteousness.

But Ephesians speaks a truth that calls us to live “with all humility and gentleness, with patience, forbearing one another in love . . . speaking the truth in love.” That does not leave much room for the sour and suspicious attitudes that fester in controversy. Controversy tends to make us forget Christ, causing us to become angry, messianic, despairing, or fearful. Ephesians presses us about such attitudes and the words they produce. Whether our words are spoken or written, they must never be rotten or harmful. They must always be grace-filled and constructive. They must always be tailor-made to time, place, person, and circumstance.

Particular false views will also markedly affect our ability to hear Ephesians for ourselves and use it well for others. For example, every professing Christian believes both in God’s grace and in human responsibility. But when it comes to determining whether God’s grace or human decision has priority in conversion, controversy often reigns. Nevertheless, every point of view must reckon with Ephesians. I find Ephesians 1:3–2:10 incontrovertible regarding the priority of grace. Our standing in Jesus Christ comes about because “God chose us in Christ before the foundation of the world” to fulfill “his purpose, who works all things after the counsel of his will” (Eph. 1:4, 11). Yes, at every point, we choose: we believe or stray, we repent or harden, we obey or rebel, we love or hate. But, the “glory of his grace” is so glorious, and the “deadness in trespasses and sins” is so dead, that any notion of dead men initiating or sustaining life-giving faith toward God without being made alive by God seems absurd to me.

In addition, God's hand in my own conversion was so strikingly invasive and intervening—so Ephesianic—that I have never doubted the utter sovereignty of grace to rescue the utterly perverted. But many Christians, of sincere faith and of more godly character than I, some of whom I know as friends and brothers, teach a more sanguine view of human ability and a less exalted view of God's grace. We disagree with each other. I think their view shallow regarding both God and man, and liable to disconcert faith's maturing and enduring joy. They think my view dreary about God and man, and liable to demotivate people. One of us is wrong about the logic of grace and responsibility. Wherever the error lies, it will certainly hinder our understanding of Paul, and will have a significant effect on how we minister to others.

Controversies of many other sorts also fight out battles in the sentences of Ephesians: church government, the nature of worship, charismatic gifts, male-female roles, the mode of spiritual warfare, the permissibility of anger, and so forth. Being wrong will make Ephesians hard to understand, and will harm both the church and the individual.<sup>3</sup>

Our Heart's Agenda

Third, the biggest hindrance to understanding arises within our own hearts. Both the intrinsic difficulty of Ephesians and specific theological controversies intersect with us! Our ability to understand Ephesians correlates with our ability to live Ephesians. Clearer faith and obedience directly enables greater understanding. Greater understanding directly fuels more energetic obedience and faith. Ephesians makes clear that two kinds of hearts operate. One basic nature is dark, hard, ignorant, self-serving, and blind: "you were formerly darkness." The other basic nature is light, tender, knowing, loving, and seeing: "now you are light in the Lord; walk as children of light" (Eph. 5:8). Paul warns against the former. He prays for and exhorts us unto the latter. And so we must warn, pray, and exhort. When you read Ephesians, believe. Ask for help. Walk it out. Encourage others. Your understanding and effectiveness will grow.

Let me make a final comment about the difficulties of understanding Ephesians and then writing about it. As an author, I am not satisfied with what I have written here. Paul wrote only a short letter. Did it take him even one day to dictate it to his secretary? From the rough syntax of 3:1-2, it looks like he nailed it on the first take. Paul's mere 2,400 words would occupy only four pages in this book. Yet the ink spilled here does not come close to doing justice to the glory of God's grace. This outline on Ephesians is rather like a park ranger's commentary at the foot of a majestic mountain. The summit stands far, far above us still, in air too rare and light too bright. I hope that you will profit from what you read, that you will think, live, and practice for the better. And where you find missteps or gaps, take up the burden, so that God's people may together attain to the unity of the faith and the knowledge of the Son of God.